

Norway's population is relatively small compared to its large geographic area, with about 5.5 million residents.

Most people live in urban areas, particularly around Oslo, Bergen, and Trondheim, while large parts of the country remain sparsely populated.

The population is known for its high life expectancy, which is among the highest in the world.

Norway also has a low population density, meaning there is a lot of space per person.

Immigration has contributed to increased diversity in recent decades, with people from many different cultural backgrounds settling in the country.

Education levels are high, and literacy rates are nearly universal.

The population benefits from a strong welfare system that supports healthcare, education, and social security, contributing to a high standard of living.
